

A first page opens with an ordinary paragraph. It begins and ends on this page, and nothing about it reaches across the page boundary.

The last paragraph of the first page is cut off by the page boundary in the middle of a sentence, which means it does not end with a full stop and therefore continues at the top of the second page, where the remainder of the same sentence finally arrives.

The last paragraph of the second page, by contrast, ends properly with a full stop. It is complete, and joining it to whatever follows would be wrong.

Chapter Two

The third page opens a new chapter. Its first paragraph has nothing to do with the last paragraph of the previous page, and a rule that always joins them will always be wrong here.
