

A long paragraph opens the left column and keeps going for several lines, because the point of this fixture is that the column has to run out of room. Reading order must survive that boundary without inventing a paragraph break where the typesetter merely ran out of vertical space.

The sentence that matters starts down here, at the foot of the left column, and it does not finish before the column ends, so it picks up again at the top of the right column and completes itself there.

A final paragraph follows in the right column. It is a separate paragraph, not a continuation of anything, and merging it into the sentence above would be exactly the failure this fixture is built to catch.
