

A single column runs down this page from top to bottom.

The gap above this paragraph is far larger than a paragraph gap. A criterion that decides column switches by looking only at how far the vertical position jumped will fire here, and it will be wrong, because there is no second column on this page to switch into.

This paragraph follows the previous one at an ordinary distance. Nothing about the pair is unusual, which is the point: the only anomaly on the page is the gap above, and it is purely vertical.
